1 ✦ The Fare

the paywall, and the life of the subscription — follows Raising the Sail · The Sky Fills In · Many Skies · Below Deck · phone portrait · v2 — the trial removed, Pro is bought outright

The one sell in a product built on restraint, and every state that follows it. Pro is two things — more skies, and the wall — so the paywall says exactly that and stops. There is no trial: Pro is bought with eyes open, never slid into. The store takes the money; the app is a mirror, never a till. And the screen that defines the brand is not the sell: it is the day Pro ends, when three skies become one lit and two paused — kept, not taken.

a Pro door → the paywall, led by your door → the store's sheet → the sail's one breath → renews · cancels · lapses → paused, not lost

One paywall, led by your door
You arrive reaching for something; the top of the screen is that thing. Everything below the first breath never changes — both benefits, both prices, one exit (1b). One screen, not two.

The store does the money
Vela designs up to the button and from the moment after (1c). Pay, switch, cancel, refund — all of it is the store's own sheet; the app repeats none of it (1e).

Time is stated, never counted
Renewal is a date in one row below deck (1d); receipts are the store's own, and Vela adds no reminders of its own. The glance and the wall never mention money at all.

Paused, not lost
Lapse deletes nothing: the front sky stays lit and free, the rest dim and wait, the wall keeps telling time over your kept arrangement (1f). Resubscribing re-lights it all at once.

Scope: cards stay placeholders. The Pro doors were designed in Many Skies and Below Deck and appear here only as origins. The store's payment and manage sheets are drawn as gray abstractions — they belong to the platform, not to Vela. Prices are placeholders: $3.99 a month, $29.99 a year.

The mascot spends its scarce budget on the ask. Warmest — the front door's gold vouching for the price — but it puts the guest to work as a salesman, and the sail has never once worked for money.

THE CALL BETWEEN THEM

B. The wall is the one benefit words undersell and a quiet picture states plainly — and a miniature that already tells your time is the honest version of "always on." No glow, no zoom: it is drawn with the same hairlines as everything else.

The sail is spent one screen later instead — on the welcome (1c), where there is nothing left to sell and everything to hand over. C is retired: the sail does not sell.

Committed: B — its first breath swaps per door (1b); the Tweaks panel swaps 1b's register live to feel all three in place.

The screen opens on the reach: the wall, miniature, already telling your time — and with no trial, this miniature is the only taste of the wall a person gets before paying. It carries the persuasion alone, so it leads. Below it the offer is constant — the other benefit as one quiet row, both prices visible, monthly the default, and a button that buys, its price in plain sight beneath. Nothing here is assembled per door except the opening.

The account door carries no errand, so nothing is pictured: the receipt reading is the neutral register, and the sentence runs in its canonical order — skies first, as the row below deck has always said it. Same rows, same prices — and with no errand to finish, the button simply says what it does.

Committed: one paywall, four first breaths — wall, second sky, ledger, and the way back after a lapse (1f). Monthly is the default plan on purpose: the annual pick must be a choice, never an ambush. There is no trial — the button buys, labeled with the errand it finishes (Hang it on the wall · Make your second sky · Go Pro · Resume Pro), and the price sits in plain sight beneath it. Nothing is revealed later that was not visible here.

Hang Home on the wall

Back to your sky

The only gold in the whole lifecycle. One bob, a plain receipt of what was just agreed to, and the reach completed: the primary button is the thing they came for. From the second-sky door it reads "Make your second sky"; from the ledger, "Back to your sky" leads. No confetti — the reward is the product.

WHY THE TERMS REPEAT

The welcome states the deal a second time — the price, and the date it renews. A subscription a person can recite is one they don't come to resent; from here on, renewal receipts are the store's own (1d).

The sail appears here and nowhere else in this chapter. It greets; it does not sell, and it does not do plumbing.

The whole lifecycle told by one row in the one place it has always lived (Below Deck). Five states, none of them counting: renewal is a date, not a timer, and the amber badge in grace is the only status color money ever gets. No banner on a sky, no badge on the glance, nothing on the wall — a subscription is plumbing.

WHY THERE IS NO NUDGE

With no trial there is no pre-charge moment to warn about — the first charge happened at the button, eyes open. Renewal receipts are the platform's own; Vela never manufactures a reason to talk about money.

The row is always there for whoever goes looking, and canceling stays the store's door (1e) — the app cannot cancel for you, so it never pretends it can.

The accent goes to staying. That is the whole argument: the person who leaves calmly is the person who comes back. Shown once, the first open after the lapse; after this the state lives in Tend and one row below deck. No sail — this is plumbing, however tender.

Paused skies stay swipeable — hiding them would feel like deletion with extra steps. The cards hold their places with their names dimmed and no data: a paused sky showing yesterday's numbers would quietly lie. One pill states it and offers the door; nothing counts, nothing blinks.

The wall never goes black — a dead rectangle on a wall is a punishment, and Vela doesn't punish. The clock stays lit (time was never for sale) and the frames hold the arrangement at a whisper, captions only. The pill surfaces on a one-second hold, like every wall state, and sinks again; most hours this is simply a quiet clock. After dark it embers, as the clock always has.

The lapsed door is the paywall's fourth first-breath: your own skies and wall, dim, named, waiting. The price is the same price — no winback coupon, no guilt. One store sheet later, every tile and the wall light in the same breath — the inverse of the lapse, and the payoff of "kept."

THE FRONT-SKY RULE

Alternative considered: a chooser — "pick the sky that stays free." Retired: it adds a decision at the worst possible moment. Front-of-row is visible, reversible, and already a drag the person knows from Tend.

Also retired: showing last-known values on paused cards. Names only — a paused sky quoting Tuesday's numbers would quietly lie, and lying is louder than silence.

A reinstall never re-sells. Restore asks the store, the store answers, and the row simply becomes true again — skies live in the account, Pro lives in the store; signing in brought the first back, this brings the second. No celebration; it was never gone.

Open seams, flagged: prices are placeholders pending the real sheet; regional pricing, offer codes and refunds are the store's machinery, not screens of ours; family sharing is unanswered; and whether the lapse letter (1f) should also appear when grace runs out silently mid-week — default yes, same letter, same once. The sail appeared exactly once in this chapter, after the money — never to ask for it. The wall never showed a price, a timer, or a paywall; its Pro gate is passed on the phone, and its lapse is a clock that keeps telling time.
